Privatizing Canada's Public Universities

by CLAIRE POLSTER

Five Kinds Of Privatization

Perhaps the most obvious kind of privatization of the university is the growing reliance on individuals rather than the collective to finance university operations. As students are asked to pay more, university tuition and other fees have been skyrocketing in recent years — as have student debts. Between 1995 and 2000-2001, tuition fees in Canada nearly doubled per year, while average student debts rose from about $2,000 to $10,000. This is because students are paying a far larger share of the costs of postsecondary education, from an average of 10 per cent of operating costs to up to 50 per cent of operating costs in 2000. As well, a growing number of university programs are slated to be, if they are not already, almost fully privately funded. For example, the University of Toronto announced its intention to increase its law school tuition to $5,000.

A second and less obvious kind of privatization of our universities has to do with the ways in which they are run. Increasingly, universities — which are public institutions — are adopting values and practices that are employed in the private sector. This shift is reflected in the new language being used in our universities in which our presidents are "to go," professors are "business managers" and students are "clients." It is reflected in the displacement of academic criteria by economic criteria in the allocation of institutional resources. And it is reflected in the many new managerial practices that are being introduced by university administrators — ranging from the creation of a wide range of institutional offices, to various forms of pseudo-consultation, to the increased use of performance indicators and merit pay to control and motivate academics — all of which erode the collegiality and institutional democracy that have been the hallmarks of university governance.

The adoption of business values and practices is a cause and consequence of another kind of privatization — the increasing growing involvement in research for the market rather than setting their own research agendas in response to a variety of social needs and interests, academic and doing more and more research for and only "clients" from the business community, who can afford to pay some of the costs of academic research. This shift towards research for the market has led to a reduction in government funding, which has led to a reduction in support for investigator-initiated research and an increase in support for "contract research." What is significant about the form of privatization is that, although control over the research agenda is being ceded to private interests, the cost of academic research is still largely borne by the public, as partners' contributions to research costs often cover only a small fraction of them.

The third kind of privatization undertaken by the Government has been creating out some policy-making functions to unaffiliated and unaccountable advisory bodies, such as the Advisory Council on Science and Technology that are dominated by members of the business community and others sympathetic to their interests. Not surprisingly, people on these powerful committees have used their position to produce policies and to recommend practices that serve their particular needs rather than those of the general public.

The final form of privatization has to do with our universities becoming for-profit businesses in their own right. Increasingly, universities and the academics within them are getting involved in lucrative entrepreneurial or commercial activities of their own — setting up side arms to handle high research, forming valuable intellectual property, setting up universities spin-off companies (often within university incubators, or "incubator" parks). This form of privatization is particularly egregious, as knowledge produced at public institutions, by public servants, with public funds, is being being freely shared with Canadian citizens but is being exploited for private profit.

It is important to emphasize that these five kinds of privatization are not discrete but are mutually reinforcing. For example, the more universities get involved in research for business, the more they have to generate as businesses, the more money they require, the more bureaucracy they require, and the less democracy and collegiality they can tolerate. Similarly, the more universities are involved in entrepreneurial activities of their own, the more resources they have to devote to these activities, hence, the increase in the tuition and other fees charged to students.

Cause For Concern

The privatization of our universities has a number of harmful implications for both students and citizens.

Growing Coca in a Fight for Survival in Bolivia

by BENJAMIN DANCLER

For centuries, coca has been used as a medicine in the Andes to relieve hunger, fatigue and sickness. Many Bolivians chew the small green leaf or drink it in tea on a daily basis. Much of the coca produced in Bolivia goes to this legal, controlled use. But the leaf is also a key ingredient in cocaine. The U.S. government has focused on coca eradication as a way to stem the flow of cocaine to the U.S. This war on drugs in Bolivia has resulted in violence, death, torture and trauma for the poor farmers who grow coca to survive. The U.S. government has directly funded this war, often facilitating human-rights violations and acting as a roadblock to peace in Bolivia. And the billions of dollars that Washington has pumped into this conflict have not diminished the amount of cocaine on the streets in the U.S.

Besides its traditional uses, in Bolivia coca is also an ingredient in Coca-Cola, cough syrups, whetstones, chewing gum and diet pills. It is sold in small bags all over the country, and is perhaps more prevalent than coffee. The U.S. Embassy's website for Bolivia suggests that chewing the leaves can alleviate altitude sickness.

"I have chewed coca every day and I am not crazy yet!" coca farmer organizer Leonilda Zurita
